John Opie, who has been living in Belgium on a Belgian-American foundation grant, called on me this morning at the suggestion of André de Staercke regarding a possible position with UNESCO. He is a highly educated young man.

I went for my second sitting this afternoon at Léonor Fini's studio.

Obby (the Duke of St. Albans) arrived today to stay with us.

Tonight the Obendorfs dined at Alfred Dehodencq. I was interested in Charlie's new invention for concrete construction, which requires no mortaring and is locked into place by its own shape and weight. He claims it would reduce present building costs in Holland, for example, by 35 percent.
